

Mount faculty member assaults colleague

By Dawn O'Connor

Police were called to the Mount on Tuesday, Sept. 18 to investigate an incident that took place between two faculty members.

Two women, aged 58 and 56 respectively, had an argument in one of the school's classrooms. The older woman then assaulted the other by hitting her on the head with a plastic T-ball bat.

The injuries suffered by the victim were not serious, although one of the women is now under medical care. The victim chose not to press charges. No students were present during the incident.

Judith Woodsworth, VP Academic at the Mount, hopes that students will stop the rumours surrounding the incident. She says that both faculty members are very upset about the incident and that the rumours will likely make their recovery more difficult.

Students affected are those who had classes with either of the professors involved in the incident. These students have been spoken to, and their concerns have been addressed.

Neither the police nor the school would reveal the identities of the faculty members because of privacy issues.

Editor's Note: We at The Picaro are aware of the identities of the faculty members involved in this incident but out of respect for their privacy we have chosen not to identify them.

Hands on approach to combatting terrorism

By Jennifer Henderson, Atlantic Bureau

LAWRENCETOWN, N.S. (CUP) -- Vianne Fowler is a firm believer in the idea that one person can make a world of difference. In the wake of last week's terrorist attacks, the Lawrencetown, Nova Scotia mother has launched an international campaign of support and unity for the victims called "Hands around the world against terrorism."

"We're asking people to trace their hands, write their name and where they live on them and mail the cutouts in," she explained.

Fowler has enlisted a local elementary school to glue the hands into a chain. When the chain is finished she plans to send it to the New York City mayor Rudolph Guiliani.

"We're all responsible for what goes on in the world. People need to be more tolerant," Fowler said.

"We're so wrapped up in what we ourselves are doing that if someone trips on the sidewalk we no longer stop to help them up,"

Fowler said she credits her eight-year-old son's desire to help the terrorism victims for spawning the campaign.

Keith Colwell is Fowler's local municipal councillor and a strong supporter of the hands project.

"We're hoping to raise awareness of peace and people working together and hopefully raise some funds for the International Red Cross too," he said.

Colwell and Fowler have been using local and national media outlets, e-mail and letters to the office of the Prime Minister and Members of Parliament to draw attention to the campaign.

Fowler estimates it will take approximately 530-million hands to make a chain long enough to circle the globe, but says she's undaunted.

"I'm hoping to have this done by Christmas but I will work on it as long as it takes," she said.

"We already have 140 hands, one baby fist and two dog prints."

Parking problems cause on campus headache

By Elizabeth Whyte

There are four seasons in Nova Scotia: Almost winter, winter, still winter and construction. This is the joke that has been told time and time again and it is understood that "construction" occurs roughly between May and August. It doesn't usually extend into September. At the Mount, however, that's exactly what happened.

For the past week students with the luxury of a car have been getting up an hour early or parking up at the Mother House parking lot and walking down to their classes while the Evaristus parking lot was re paved. This has caused some complaints among the students, especially those who don't live close to campus and for whom getting up early sometimes means six in the morning.

D.J. Awalt was one of the students unhappy with the parking problems.

"I pay one hundred dollars to park here, the least they could do is give us a better place," he says.

According to Awalt usually if you get to school by nine you are guaranteed a spot, but with the construction that had been going on nine o'clock parking was not an option.

Glenn Hollet, chief of security says there is no reason for students to have trouble finding places to park, that they just aren't going far enough away from Seton to look.

"If you are going downtown to go shopping in one store, you just don't look there for a parking spot. You go at least a block away to find one", he says.

Hollet says that if students have trouble finding a parking spot they should go to Assisi desk and Security will help them find a place.

There are seven hundred spaces in twenty-two lots so there should not be a problem finding somewhere to park.

Although it might have seemed like longer to students, the Evaristus parking lot was only off limits for six days. The Mother House parking lot was opened to provide extra spaces and a shuttle service was offered.

Construction or not, students should give themselves at least fifteen minutes before class so they will have enough time to find a place to park. That way if they do have to walk they will have time.

No such thing as "holy" war

There was a common cry for immediate military retaliation in the days following the terrible events of September 11. I found myself growing more and more uneasy as George Bush and his representatives, media commentators, political pundits, and even the average person on the street joined together their calls for war. What astounded me was that apparently George Bush had a 90% approval rating for this declaration of war.

Certainly I felt grief, horror, and anger at the attacks on New York and Washington. On one level, it felt natural to want retaliation. But, as I began to reflect, and talk to others, a growing affirmation of my own intuitive voice that violence is not the answer began to emerge. I cringed every time I heard the term "holy war." Surely this must be an oxymoron?

As a person of faith, I believe that God is present within each living being. How can any violence ever be justified in the name of this Divine presence within each and every one of us? This to me is the ultimate blasphemy. As I continued to formulate my thoughts and reactions over the past two weeks, statements from church groups began to emerge. From a letter from Canadian church leaders: "The peace we seek will not be based on conquering others, forcing peoples into submission, hurting the innocent, or ignoring the victims and people marginalized throughout our world ... It will be a path of justice, equity, and security for all." From the Moderator of the United Church of Canada, Rev. Marion Parry, "... let us appeal for decisions based on God's wisdom, on being justice-seekers and peace-makers." From members of the Faith in Action Committee of the Maritime Conference of the United Church of Canada: "All war is self-destructive. If war could indeed bring about peace, history would have provided us with a peaceful world long ago."

After reading these letters from Canadian churches, I wondered if there might be the same kinds of statements coming out of the U.S. I was interested to see if there were American responses that were more reflective, more tempered than the ones I had seen in the mainstream media. I was not disappointed in my search. I found a wonderful website - "Sojo Net" - the online voice of Sojourners Magazine, from Washington, DC. Their mission statement says that they are "... a Christian Ministry whose mission is to proclaim and practice the biblical call to integrate spirituality renewal and social justice. In our lives and in our work we seek to be guided by the biblical principles of justice, mercy and humility." Under the link "Responding in Faith", I read many articles written by Americans around the country. These articles and columns had titles such as "Don't let our values be a casualty too", "Let us be slow to anger and quick to listen" "How far does our compassion reach?", "Lead us not into war", and "Not in our son's name." All of them, while deploring the terrorist attacks, called for a sober second thought in the wake of the tragedy and a commitment to non-violence and peace-making. I commend the website (<http://www.sojo.net>) to all who may be interested in reading more.

Also on the website is "Deny them Their Victory, A Religious Response to Terrorism", a document developed in consultation with Jewish, Muslim and Christian clergy. This document has been signed by more than 1,000 people including Christian, Jewish, Muslim and Buddhist leaders. Signers from the Christian community include Protestant, Roman Catholic, Evangelical, Orthodox, Historic Black Church and Historic Peace Church traditions. It is one of the most inclusive religious statements ever released. It says: "... But we must not, out of anger and vengeance, indiscriminately retaliate in ways that bring on even more loss of innocent life. ... we can deny them their victory by refusing to submit to a world created in their image. Terrorism inflicts not only death and destruction but also emotional oppression to further its aims. We must not allow this terror to drive us away from being the people God has called us to be. We assert the vision of community, tolerance, compassion, justice and the sacredness of human life, which lies at the heart of all our religious traditions."

I also happened to tune in to the Oprah show recently. It was a show that featured prominent women who had joined the call for non-violence. Rep. Barbara Lee from the United States Congress was the only representative to vote no to giving George Bush unlimited power to respond to the terrorist attacks. She said that it was a very difficult decision, but after praying, and thinking about how people of faith should respond she had to vote with her conscience. She has received criticism for this, but is unwavering in her decision. I admire her courage. Her last comment was "as women, we need to instruct our children about violence so that they will inherit a peaceful world." As I write this I feel more hopeful than I have since that terrible day. It is a hopeful sign for me that there is a growing movement committed to non-violent resolution emerging across the continent, and around the world. We need to hear each others' voices, voices from different faith traditions, women's voices, students' voices, voices from those who have for too long been voiceless. We need to empower others to join in the chorus. Thousands, perhaps millions of lives are at stake.

For noble cause

My two daughters continue to determine who I will become. They are my heart. I am theirs. Now eighteen and sixteen, the time is nearing when they will turn to me, and tell me that they must go to the furthest ends of the earth to discover new terrain. I will cry a lot in that moment. I know this about myself. I will realize more profoundly than I could have realized before that moment, the sacred nature of a love affair that began in a small cavity of my body.

I will remember the warmth of their tiny unborn bodies tucked into mine; the moment of their splendid arrival! I will remember the shape of their tiny heads, and the smell of their new born skin. I will remember it all....I know this about myself... I will remember plastic high chairs, the splattered mush of food on kitchen walls... I will remember the accidents on freshly scrubbed floors, the tiny bodies hovered around my feet at the grocery store, in the bathroom...at the mailbox...I will remember the crayons and the bubblegum on bedroom walls. I will remember warm tiny bodies wrapped in bath towels, breathlessly beautiful faces sound asleep beneath the weight of heavy blankets....I will remember the chicken pox, the flu, the first day of school, the nightmares...I will remember believing that the love and the innocence of my children, in time, would transform, not just me, but the entire world...

I went back to school at forty. I graduated from MSVU with a masters degree in Education in 1999. The entire experience was a harsh and horrible experience for me. Every moment of the entire degree terrified me. No longer was I in the paradise of the loving world I had created for my beautiful babies in the solace of my home. No longer were the people around me deeply and profoundly concerned about the heart of me, and the soul of me. Others responses to me left me confused, disoriented, unsure. I couldn't read or decipher what seemed to be ordinary symbols to everybody else. In the world of the "learned," there were rules I couldn't understand. There were silences I couldn't decode. All I knew for sure was that the world as we were to make "sense" of it inside the classroom walls, bore no relation whatsoever to the warm and vibrant world I knew, that had at its core, the gorgeous sound of a human heart. It made no sense to me that people seemed embarrassed to have a heart. Who could possibly believe that an education void of feeling - void of humanity - could do anything to assist the welfare of young children? It made no sense.

When I'd completed the five units I was to complete in order to obtain a Masters degree in Education, I was sent a letter by the Chair of the Dept. telling me that I should be proud of my effort; that obtaining a Masters degree was a "significant accomplishment."

What was, undoubtedly, written with the intention of encouraging me, ended up (curiously enough) having the reverse affect on me.... I felt as though all my years of loving and caring for my children had absolutely no value or meaning to the very school responsible for informing the practices of public school teachers! I felt as though my school had an outside shell that was supposed to stand for something, but in reality, it had no inside.. There was no heart... Completing five units of graduate study was an accomplishment of sorts I see now, but placed alongside eighteen years of passionate, committed parenting, it wasn't nearly as significant as all that.....

I look to the faces of my daughters today, and I see the strength, the intelligence and the faith that will carry them through this world. I look to the faces of my daughters today and I see a deep and profound certainty that comes with the experience of knowing deep down inside the bones of their feet that they are loved; that somebody from the moment of their miraculous arrival, deemed their lives worthwhile; deemed each of them, profoundly worthwhile.. In the scheme of things, Mount Saint Vincent University, that's significant. I don't mind telling you now.

Carole E. Trainor M ED Mother

The entire experience was harsh and horrible for me. Every moment of the entire degree terrified me.

CIBC Run For The Cure: Who would you run or walk for?

By Shanon Archibald

One year ago, waves of white T-shirts surged past the gates of Point Pleasant Park. Arms pumping, shoulders back, in classic power walking style they rounded Robie and headed back to the St. Mary's campus. Refreshments, commemorative coins and prizes awaited the participants of the 2000 CIBC Run for the Cure. Event organizers announced the money totals and thanked the crowd for their efforts. Cancer survivors spoke of the hope that soon a cure for breast cancer would be found. The almost 4,000 walkers and runners were left feeling that they had been a part of something extraordinary.

The CIBC Run for the Cure is not a typical walk-a-thon. It is a national fundraising campaign that last year alone raised $9.3 million for cancer research.

Several statistics may cause Mount students to join the event. Nova Scotia has the highest cancer mortality rate in Canada. One in nine Canadian women will develop breast cancer. Registration for the Run is $30, $25 if you met the deadline and free if you can collect $100. However, these facts are often not enough to motivate students to join the Mount team. For many there has to be more than logical reasoning, there has to be an emotional appeal. This year's campaign asks, "Who would you run for?" Many students join because they know someone who has had cancer or they are survivors themselves. They walk or run because they know they are helping to fund the research that one day will wipe out this disease. It is a way to fight the feelings of helplessness and frustration often associated with cancer. Almost everyone can think of someone to run for; cancer has left few families untouched.

For MSVU Birch 5 resident Adele Stevens, last year's event was reason enough to sign-up this year.

"It was an impressive scene. On the field, the road, there was this throng of us, all in T-shirts and all for cancer. I was in special company. I'm doing the Run again this year to relive the experience."

This year is the 10th anniversary of the event and the warm-up begins at 9:40 a.m. on Sept. 30 on the SMU football field. At 10:00 a.m. those running the five kilometers head out onto Inglis St. followed by the larger group of walkers.

The Mount has another strong team this year of approximately 170 students, staff and faculty. Diane Tinkham, a co-coordinator of the Mount effort said that while this year's registration numbers are down the focus is on ensuring the day is a positive one for those involved.

"It is such a heart-warming event, it's uplifting to see people of all ages come out and be a part of the Run," she says.

By the time this article has been printed and read the 2001 CIBC Run for the Cure will have taken place. The opportunity to be a part of this year's Run has passed but research will continue to be done for many years. So next year you'll have the chance again, whatever your motivation, to walk or run for the Cure.

Radio airplay affected by terrorist attacks

songs pulled from playlists following September 11

By Sarah Steeves

When the United States was attacked on September 11, our lives changed in subtle, yet undeniable ways. Airspace was closed down in order to prevent any further terrorism, suspicious-looking people arrested for nothing more than being in the wrong place at the wrong time. People have become more sensitive and emotional as well. Radio stations in America have received recommendations to ban many previously innocuous seeming songs from the radio.

Although most people are sensitive to the emotions surrounding the attacks, not everyone is in favour of extensive changes to playlists. Canadian media critic John Corcelli says that there should be some limitations to songs being pulled from the radio.

"I don't believe in censorship, but some songs are more appropriate to be played at this time than others."

This seems to be the common feeling among radio programmers and media watchers. Corcelli believes that problems with playing songs arise when they are taken out of context and reinterpreted in light of recent events.

While the effects on Canadian radio stations have not been as extensive as in the US, there have been changes. A few songs have been pulled from the playlists of Halifax radio stations C100 and Q104, but only temporarily, and they will be re-added in the near future. The songs were pulled out of respect for the terrorism victims and due to public sensitivity to anything with even vague reference to the

Songs that were pulled from Q104's playlist included "Crumbling Down" by John Mellencamp, "The End Of The World As We Know It" by REM, and "I Feel Safe In New York City."

September 11 attacks. At Q104, the playlists were reviewed carefully by song title, but according to J.C. Douglas, the station's program director, it was impossible to avoid all potentially offensive songs.

Even after careful consideration of what songs should be played, Douglas says that were still some complaints. "Strange Days" by the Matthew Good Band was one of the songs mentioned.

Songs that were pulled from Q104's playlist included "Crumbling Down" by John Mellencamp, "The End Of The World As We Know It" by REM, and "I Feel Safe In New York City." Terry Williams, Program Director for C100 also pulled songs including "Falling For The First Time" by the Barenaked Ladies.

He indicated that C100 was also focusing on playing more upbeat numbers since the attacks.

"We tried to play more positive songs as well, such as 'Peaceful World.'"

When asked if he thinks the attacks will have any long-term affect on the music industry, Williams mentioned an interview with Fred Durst, lead singer of Limp Bizkit, that he had read, in which Durst said his music will change as a result of the recent events.

"Music to come over the next year is going to reflect a difference. And we may see a kinder, gentler response from musicians in the future," says Williams.

As to how extensive the effects on the music industry will be, it is hard to say. As Douglas put it,

"It depends on what happens next."

Listen up!

Jonathan M: Day After Day

When I first played his album in the Picaro office, after everyone stopped laughing, the first comment was "This sounds some guy sitting in his basement with a keyboard and singing along." That pretty much sums it up. That and the fact that it sounds like something left over from the '80's. Something BAD leftover from the '80's. Someone commented that they must have said "Oh well, it didn't sell in the '80's, let's try it again!" It also kind sounds like that song from the Simpson's episode that NSYNC was on. That's pretty much all I can say about this. In summary: Don't buy it!

Joydrop: Viberate

I really enjoyed this CD. It reminded me a lot of the first CD that Veruca Salt put out. The lyrics are original, and actually have some meaning. Finally a band that actually has something to say. The music has lots of energy and manages to express lots of emotion without being sappy. Their first single, "Sometimes Wanna Die" has been getting tons of airplay on MuchMusic, and deservedly so. There's a lot of potential on here for future hit singles as well.

Handsome Devil: Love and Kisses From the Underground

The most completely angst-free "punk" CD ever made. It does not even deserve to be called punk. First of all, if you're on BMG's label, you are no longer considered underground. I don't think there's a single political lyric on the whole CD. They sound exactly like Gob (minus lyrics that are actually good), and the inside of the liner looks suspiciously like the the inside of liner for Dude Ranch by Blink 182 (maybe this is intentional, I don't know). If you enjoy totally watered down punk, then buy this album. If you don't, stick to Pennywise and Rancid, cause I sure will be.

311: From Chaos

Finally an original band. Combining aspects of hip-hop, rock, electronica and punk, they come up with something totally original and fresh. The lyrics demonstrate that they actually have a vocabulary of more than 200 words, something that seems to be getting rarer and rarer. Some songs remind me a lot of The Red Hot Chili Peppers, so if you're an RHCP fan, you'll probably like this album. And if you want something that's different, definitely pick this one up.

Stompin' Tom: Sings Canadian History

This album is for anyone who failed grade 8 Social Studies. If you never managed to memorize all the capitols of Canada, then the song "Name the Capitols" is for you, complete with children who sing along. You can even sing along too, if you want! There's also lots of riveting songs about the Bluenose, the Confederation Bridge, and, of course, Sable Island! Canadian Studies majors, pick up this album and you'll never have to study for another exam.

MSVU soccer team in first place

The MSVU Women's soccer team is off to a super start to the 2001 season. As of September 27th, the team is a perfect 3-0 and has looked very impressive in victories over STU (8-1), NSAC (4-1), and KINGS (1-0). Nicole Meldrum leads the team with 6 goals, while Sara Gillis has added 5.

Coach Jacques Boudreau has had all of his players executing at a high level and that's led to an exciting start to the season. The team now leaves for a two game road trip into New Brunswick on September 29th and 30th against STU and UNBSJ with first place on the line.

The team returns home for its next local game on October 3rd against KINGS at Wickwire Field. Game time is 6pm. Lets rally behind the team and make yourselves heard at the next game. On the horizon – Sunday, October 14 VS UNBSJ at Wickwire Field. Best of Luck, and keep up the great play!

Tales from the Smackdown Hotel

By "The Game" Steven Ryan and "Mr. Monday Night" Dave White

If We Could Be Serious For A Moment

Knowing that our readers want to get the Smackdown info as much as Lillian Garcia wants the People's strudel, we will get to some behind the scenes lowdown. Ever wondered how wrestlers can kick their opponents in the face and make that devastating "smack" sound, without really injuring them? Actually, many wrestlers use a big kick as a move, but Test and Tajiri make the move look very real. These two wrestlers have perfected the move to have the effect that seems to knock their opponent out. The lowdown is, just before striking the opponent both Test and Tajiri slap their Thigh to make that loud sound. The reason for these two to be the best ...They both wear leather type pants. Now you know!

What?

What is the deal with Kronik quitting the WWF? Are these guys crazy? Where do they go from here? There isn't any competition anymore. The thing that makes this even worse is the fact that the Undertaker got Kronik their shot in the WWF in early September by convincing Vince McMahon to take them. Vince was against the idea but trusted the Undertakers judgment. 3 weeks later Kronik refused to "sell the moves" of the Undertaker and Kane at Unforgiven, and subsequently were about to be demoted to the WWF's training facility in Ohio. Instead, Kronik quit and left the Undertaker with a bruised ego because he was one of only a few people who believed that that Kronik could be team players. Hey Kronik, we heard that Real Action Wrestling needed two stiff. Good Luck.

Can You Dig It Sucka?

The talk of the hotel has been all about the newest crime fighting superhero to hit the airwaves, the Hurricane and his comedy angle. Our Hurra-senses are telling us that Shane Helms or Harry Helms or whatever his name was would have never gotten over with the fans. As you can see there's a hurricane a comin', and we believe some tag team titles won't be long behind. Now teamed with Lance Storm this team may provide us with not only superb wrestling, but also some of the greatest slapstick comedy ever. We still can't figure out how he makes people nearly blow over when he leaves. Amazing.

Sharpshooter

This editions sharpshooter is Booker T. The Booker Man is on a tremendous roll since entering the WWF, which has lead to feuds with the Rock and Kurt Angle, not to mention the introduction of the most electrifying move in sports entertainment, the Spinarooni. Overlooking the fact that he resembles Bert from Sesame Street, the Book has given the WWF the shot in the arm it so desperately needed.
